SPORTS TEAMS AND LEAGUES HELP THE COMMUNITY THROUGH THEIR CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Have you ever thought about using your education in sport management to help the community? Most leagues along with their teams know the importance of being a good civic partner. That’s why they invest dollars in community relations departments and donate to non-profit organizations. A few years ago the Robert Woods Johnson Foundation recognized the unique niche which teams and player foundations play in the non-profit world and formed the Sports Philanthropy Project. If this aspect of sports interests you, an internship would be one way to get your foot in the door. It also helps to volunteer for non-profits and take advantage of workshops offered by local community foundations as well as the Association of Fundraising Professionals. Locally all the South Florida pro teams have dedicated departments. Check out the picture above from last Sunday’s South Florida Chapter of the NFL Alumni Annual Charity Bowling Tournament. Pictured above are Shannon Raita-Hill, Jennifer Bucknell (NSU Athletics), Professor Olson and former Miami Dolphin Sean Hill.
